

A North Carolina Ex-Felon Most Valuable Election

Not only do prisoners being release from North Carolina Prisons have an obligation to utilize their voting rights, and encouraging their family and friends to do the same. They also have a very special election that is mandatory to their well being. "Judicial Election". Approximately a week before North Carolina prisoners are released, their city or county law enforcement, are aware of the prisoners release. At this point the ex-felon becomes prey to a racial criminal justice system who need the ex-felons re-entry into the penal system to secure their employment.

North Carolina lawmakers recently ended the 2002 law that created public financing of judicial elections as part of a comprehensive voter bill that also mandated voter ID's, starting 2016. Public financing money had it's good points. Outsider groups spending millions may be the cause of the many African Americans re-entry problem into North Carolina Prisons. Making us prey to the predators of this states racial criminal and judicial system.

Bob Hall director of Democracy North Carolina A group that advocate for public financing wrote the following in the
